COMMENT #1: (Received in writing via email on August 19, 2024)

So if I understood the Times article, the state paid 3 million, got back 1.3 million from the company that created the mess and that is considered good? Seems they managed to get the state to pay 1.7 million to clean up their mess. Why? (Commenter #1)

RESPONSE: Arxada was only partially responsible for the waste the Department cleaned up at the site. Additionally, there were issues concerning Arxada's history with the site and whether its waste was located at the site as a matter of sale or disposal. Those and other factors led to the Department's settlement for less than its total response costs. The Department continues in its efforts to gain additional reimbursement from other responsible parties.
